Motion capture technology is improving year-after-year, and in FIFA 22 players have access to dynamic, hyper-responsive players on all 11 clubs' teams. For a more specific look at the technology used in FIFA 22, take a look at the video above. HyperMotion™ is the signature innovation that makes FIFA 22 the best-looking, most realistic football game to date, offering some of the biggest improvements to the rendering engine of the series and increasing the number of on-screen camera views, for more realism. It's all aimed at bringing the total football experience to life. "In FIFA 21, we gave fans new ways to express themselves in game, but with the boost to the rendering engine, the design and finish of the game now better reflects the creativity of the sport of football and how players truly move," said Greg Goodrich, Creative Director, EA SPORTS. "The fact that 22 FIFA players from all over the world took part in this intensive training camp is a testament to the incredible technical work done by our teams to make sure fans have their own unique avatar with FIFA 22. We're also excited to include different player models in FIFA 22 so players can choose from five different body types and face options, including a good number of ethnicities." With all the hype surrounding the FIFA 22 player models in the coming months, keep an eye on this site as we'll be reviewing the new player faces and comparing them to the FIFA 21 player models. FIFA 22 also will feature the return of the ball physics engine, which has received a substantial boost in FIFA 22, and changes have been made to all of the iconic stadiums in the latest installment of the franchise. But before we start reviewing the updated stadiums, please note that they haven't been fully reworked from the ground up, so players should expect a few issues with stadiums such as missing grass textures, inconsistent lighting, and other quality-of-life changes. These issues may be partially solved by the new "Real Player Motion" or RPM feature. RPM removes the animation delay (painting and masking) from the FIFA 21 engine and replaces it with "Real Player Motion," which was originally used to correct player responsiveness and ball animations for the FIFA 19 engine. This allows players to see the ball hit a player in real-time with the desired speed rather than having to wait until
