Main menu Post navigation Day three of the longest week ever. Before the closure on Friday, I had two things that had to be done by this Sunday: Finish the week at work. And, Get the kids to school and to preschool. See? Good. Weekends were never "special" before kids. Special hours were spent waiting for the school bus on Friday mornings and the family bus to our vacation spot on Saturdays. Now, the working vacation is all about the kids. The rest of the week is spent getting them to and from places, mostly at my husband's behest. He wants to pick them up on a regular basis, not only on the weekends, but also on weekdays after school and on the way to or from extracurricular activities. I don't mind. It's nice to be able to pick up the kids without having to take a day off from work. It's nice to pick them up together. It's nice to give them a break. But, the kids would rather sleep on the weekends than be awake on weekdays. And, the aforementioned preschool, which happens to be a 30 minute drive away from our home, runs two mornings and two afternoons each week. That means the first day of preschool is Monday, second day is Tuesday, third day is Wednesday, fourth day is Thursday and on Fridays they go to their playgroup and then pick up at preschool. On one of the days, that would be Wednesday. On the others, it would be Thursday. I'm usually not one to complain about picking the kids up early. I'm not really a grumpy mom. In fact, I think most moms can relate to being overly exhausted on weekdays after the kids go to bed at 7:30 p.m. In addition, my husband and I are flexible in our schedules, so we have always been up to getting the kids early. But, my Saturday morning routine has totally changed. On Saturday mornings, I just want to sleep in. I don't necessarily want to shower. I'm not opposed to eating breakfast at my desk. I just want to lay in bed watching television until our family bus to the vacation spot arrives. One of these days, I want to go back to that time when the only energy I had was in my morning. I remember when there was nothing at
