No. 4,589,876 discloses a motor vehicle having a traction control system. The electronic sensor which controls the solenoid valves of the anti-lock brake system of this motor vehicle includes a carbon brush which extends across an opening in a secondary coil of the magneto. The brush contacts an armature of a Hall element which is kept at a predetension. This resilient contact resists the action of the spring. The brush wears by erosion of the carbon and the brush material becomes conductive due to oxidation. The voltage drop of the Hall element which is proportionally indicated by the voltage between a terminal of the Hall element and a reference voltage is therefore adversely influenced by the increased resistance of the brush. In other words, the resistance of the brush increases and the voltage at the Hall element rises so that the indications obtained by the Hall element do not correspond to the true distance of the armature with respect to the magneto.
